“ I had a little brother with a crooked foot, ears that stuck straight out, a childhood lisp and a natural Sean Penn scowl above his long chin. He could see them coming at him on the playground and took no shat from anybody. It’s how I learned to fight. Gil must have taken the same rash all his life, and he developed a sarcastic wit that was professional grade. Underneath the crust, Gil had a kindness that peeked out in all the people he helped over the years including Kathleen. He never talked about it, but social workers that I knew would tell me about Gil bringing someone into the office, trying to get them some help. Gil’ deserves a tribute. Here’s mine. He bore the weight of life and helped folks who needed it most. I have a mental image, given to me by our friend Neil, of Gil on Bourbon Street wearing Birkenstock sandals over calf-high black socks and plaid shorts with a silly-ass grin for anyone who gave him a double take. My old friend, Gil.
